Napier does not explain his view of the literal meaning of logarithmus. It is commonly taken to mean 'ratio number', and as thus interpreted it is not inappropriate, though its fitness is not obvious without explanation. Perhaps, however, Napier may have used λόγος merely in the sense of 'reckoning', 'calculation' (cf. LOGISTIC).

One of a particular class of arithmetical functions, invented by John Napier of Merchiston (died 1617), and tabulated for use as a means of abridging calculation. The essential property of a system of logarithms is that the sum of the logarithms of any two or more numbers is the logarithm of their product. Hence the use of a table of logarithms enables a computer to substitute addition and subtraction for the more laborious operations of multiplication and division, and likewise multiplication and division for involution and evolution.

The word is now understood to refer only to systems in which the logarithm of any number  $a^n$  is  $x$ ,  $a$  being a constant which is called the base of the system. The logarithms (of sines) tabulated by Napier himself were not logarithms in this restricted sense, but were functions of what are now called the Napierian (also Neperian), hyperbolic, or natural logarithms, the base of which, denoted by the symbol  $e$  or  $e$ , is 2.71828... This system is still in use for analytical investigations, but for common purposes the system used is that invented by Napier's friend Henry Briggs (died 1630), the base of which is 10; the Briggsian or Briggian logarithms are also known as common or decimal logarithms. For binary, Gaussian logarithm, see the adjs. Logistic logarithms (see quot. 1795); also called proportional logarithms.

In mathematical notation 'the logarithm of' is expressed by the abbreviation 'log,' prefixed to numeral figures or algebraical symbols. When necessary, the base of the system is indicated by adding an inferior figure; thus 'log<sub>10</sub> a' means 'the logarithm of a to the base 10'.

-loger (lōgər), the ending of a few words which are virtually adaptations of actual or assumable Gr. words in -logos (L. -logus): see LOGUE, -LOGY. The oldest of these is astrologer (14th c.); it is uncertain whether this was f. L. astrolog-us + -ER in which case it is an unusually early example of a type of derivation afterwards common, or whether it was f. astrology + -ER (cf. the similar formation of astronomer, astronomer). On the analogy of this word, -loger was applied in a few instances to form personal designations correlative with words in -logy, -logic, as in chronologer, geologer, philologer (obsolescent), theologer (horologer is of different formation). The suffix is no longer a living formative, being superseded by -LOGIST.

1. The branch of philosophy that treats of the forms of thinking in general, and more especially of inference and of scientific method. (Prof. J. Cook Wilson.)

The proper scope of this department of study has been and is much controverted, and books on 'logic' differ widely in the range of subjects which they include. The definition formerly most commonly accepted is 'the art of reasoning'; for various modern definitions see the later quot. At all times the vulgar notion of 'logic' has been largely that it is a system of rules for convincing or confounding an opponent by argument.

In the Middle Ages logic (or dialectic, q.v.) was one of the three sciences composing the 'trivium'; the former of the two divisions of the seven 'liberal arts'.

-logic (lɒdʒɪk), -logical (lɒdʒɪkəl), endings originally occurring in adaptations (through F. and L.) of Gr. adjs. in -λογικός, derived from adjs. and sbs. in -λογος, -λογον, which have derivative nouns of quality or function in -λογία, represented in Eng. by -LOGY. As the meaning of an adj. in -logic(al) may with substantial correctness be rendered by 'pertaining to -logy', such adjs. are commonly apprehended as derivatives of the related sbs. (as if f. —logy + -ic). In general, the existence of a sb. in -logy now implies the potential existence of a correlative adj. in -logical (the exceptions being confined to a few of the older words, such as apology, which have corresponding adjs. of different formation). For the difference in meaning between adjs. in -logic and the (now much more frequent) adjs. in -logical, see -ICAL, and cf. the note under LOGOLOGIC 1.

-logist, an ending resulting from the addition of -IST to sbs. in -LOGY, forming sbs. with the general sense 'one who is versed in -logy'. It is now the only living formative with this function, the older equivalents -loger, -logian, -logue occurring only in very few words (most of which are obsolete). The formation is mainly English, though a few examples, as etymologist, chronologist, have existed in Fr. from the 16th or 17th c., and others, as zoologist, appear first in the 19th c. Logistic (lɒdʒɪstɪk), a. and sb. [ad. med. 1. Logos (lɒɡɒs). Theol. and Philos. [Gr. λόγος word, speech, discourse, reason, f. λογ-, ablaut-variant of λεγ- in λέγειν to say.] A term used by Greek (esp. Hellenistic and Neo-Platonist) philosophers in certain metaphysical and theological applications developed from one or both of its ordinary senses 'reason' and 'word'; also adopted in three passages of the Johannine writings of the N.T. (where the English versions render it by 'Word') as a designation of Jesus Christ; hence employed by Christian theologians, esp. those who were versed in Greek philosophy, as a title of the Second Person of the Trinity. By mod. writers the Gr. word is used untranslated in historical expositions of ancient philosophical speculation, and in discussions of the doctrine of the Trinity in its philosophical aspects.

-logue (lɒɡ), the form assumed by the Gr. -λογία, -λογία in adapted words (most of them through Fr.), as analogue, catalogue, dialogue. The words with this ending which are designations of persons (in most instances repr. actual or assumed Gr. compounds of -λόγος 'speaker, discourses', and related to parallel formations in -logy) are now little used, derivatives in -loger, -logist, or -logian being commonly preferred. Examples are Assyriologue, Astrologue, ideologue, philologue, Sinologue, theologue.

2. The heartwood of an American tree (Hamamelis virginiana) used in dyeing; so called from being imported in the form of logs.

It is used to some extent in medicine as an astringent. The alleged use of logwood in colouring spurious or adulterated port wine was at one time a frequent subject of jocular allusion.

Logy (lɒɡɪ), a. U.S. [Of uncertain origin: cf. log, heavy, dull.] Dull and heavy in motion or thought.

b. Used as sb.: A heavy fish. 1897 R. KIPLING Captains Courageous 61 'He's a logy. Give him room accordin' to his strength', cried Dan. 'I'll help ye. 'No, you won't', Harvey snapped, as he hung on to the line. 'It's my first fish'.

-logy (lɒdʒi), earlier written -logie, an ending occurring originally in words adapted from Gr. words in -λογία (the earliest examples, e.g. theology, having come through F. -logie, med.L. -logia). These Gr. words for the most part are parasynthetic derivatives; in some instances the terminal element is λόγος word, discourse (e.g. in τετραλογία tetralogy, τριλογία trilogy); more commonly it is the root λογ- (ablaut-variant of λεγ-, λέγειν to speak: cf. LOGOS). In the latter case, the sbs. in -λογία usually denote the character, action, or department of knowledge proper to the person who is described by an adj. or sb. in -λόγος, meaning either '(one) who speaks (in a certain way)', or '(one) who treats of (a certain subject)'. Hence the derivatives in -λογία are of two classes, (1) those which have the sense of 'saying or speaking', examples of which are the words anglicized as battology, brachylogy, cacology, dittology, eulogy, palilogy, tautology; and (2) names of sciences or departments of study. As the words of the last-mentioned class have always a sb. for their first element, and o is the combining vowel of all declensions of Gr. sbs., the ending of these compounds is in actual use always -λογία, becoming -ology in Eng. The names of sciences with this ending are very numerous: some represent words already formed in Gr., as theology, astrology; many represent formations which might legitimately have existed in Gr., as geology, zoology, psychology; others are of hybrid composition, as sociology, terminology, insectology. The modern formations in -logy follow the analogy of Gr. formations in having o as the combining vowel; exceptions are petrology (an incorrect form which some writers prefer to petrologie because it shows the derivation from πέτρα rock, not from πέτρος stone) and mineralogy (F. minéralogie which may be viewed as a contraction for **minéralologie*). The suffix -ology is freely used in the formation of humorous nonce-wds., some of which are illustrated below. All the modern formations in -logy may be said to imply correlative formations in -logical and -logist; in the case of some of the older words, the related personal designation ends in -loger or -logian. (Cf. -LOGUE.) Hence LOGY nonce-wd. = LOGY.

For examples of the OF. and med. L. terms see J. M. Manly in Harvard Studies Philol. & Lit. I. (1892) 88 ff. The main difficulty is that these terms appear, whenever their sense can be determined, to mean the octave of Pentecost, or Trinity Sunday. Prof. Manly, however, points out that there is evidence that 'Pentecost' was sometimes used for the season beginning at Easter and closed by Whitsunday, so that the transference of the name 'close of Pentecost' from Trinity Sunday to Whitsunday, though lacking direct evidence, is not improbable. The use may have been merely local English; the Ayenbite and Shorham both belong to Kent.]

13. a. Phonetics and Prosody. Applied to a vowel (in mod. use also to a consonant) when its utterance has the greater of the two measures of duration that are recognized in the ordinary classification of speech-sounds. Also, in Prosody, of a syllable: Belonging to that one of the two classes which is supposed to be distinguished from the other by occupying a longer time in utterance. (Opposed to short.) Long mark: the mark (—) placed over a vowel letter to indicate long quantity.

In Greek and Latin metre, a syllable is reckoned long (1) when it contains a long vowel or a diphthong, and (2) when its vowel is followed by more than one consonant (to the latter rule there are certain exceptions). A short syllable is conventionally supposed to occupy one time-unit (mora) in utterance, and a long syllable two. The distinction between the two classes of syllables, with criteria nearly identical with those of Gr. and Latin, is recognized in the prosody of many other peoples; in Skr. the equivalents of 'long' and 'short' are used of vowels only, syllables being classed as 'heavy' and 'light'.

Various inaccurate uses of the terms long and short were formerly almost universal in Eng., and are still common. (1) The vowel of a 'long' syllable, if 'naturally' short, was said to be 'long by position'. (2) By a confusion between the principles of quantitative and those of accentual verse, the stressed syllables, on the periodical recurrence of which the rhythm of English verse depends, were said to be 'long', and the unstressed syllables 'short'. (3) In ordinary language ('the long a, e, i, o, or u' denotes that sound of the letter which is used as its alphabetical name, while 'the short a, e, i, o, or u' denotes the sound which the letter most commonly has in a stressed short syllable (in the notation used in this Dictionary, respectively a, e, i, o, u). c 1000 ÆLFRIC Grant. iv. (Z). 37 On langne a geendiað geiscioð naman feminin gendiað. 1418-20 LYDG. *Chron. 14. Comm. Said of the market (esp. in the cotton trade) when consumers have provided against an anticipated scarcity by large contracts in advance. See quot. 1859. Phrase, to go (heavily) long.

1859 BARTLETT Dict. Amer., Long and short. Broker's terms. 'Long' means when a man has bought stock on time, which he can call for at any day he chooses. He is also said to be 'long' when he holds a good deal. Mod. Newspaper. The spinners had gone heavily long, and consequently did not need to buy except in very small quantities. It was found that selling was impossible except at constantly declining prices; that the market was heavily long; and that there was no short interest of any moment.

2. The suppression of the qualified adj., adv., or phrase, in expressions like to be long about one's work, causes the adv. long to assume the character of a quasi-adjectival predicate = 'occupying a long time', 'delaying long'. Const. in, † of, † a (with gerund; the prep. is now often omitted colloq.), also followed by conj. ere, or, before.

The originally advb. character of the word in this use is shown by the form longe (rhyming with longe) in the first example, and by the analogy of the similar use of the advb. phrase in to be a long time. Cf. however F. être long a.

Long, obs. form of LONG; aphectic f. ALONG.

-long (lɒŋ), †-longa suffix, forming advs. The earliest instance is endlong, from ON. endlang-r adj., 'extending from end to end', 'the whole length of'. The word is properly a compound of LONG a.; but in Eng. it was principally used as adv., and developed the sense 'end-wise', 'end foremost', so that it became parallel in meaning to words like sidelong, headlong, backlong. The ending -long thus came to be regarded as a variant of -ING suffix<sup>2</sup>. Hence, on the one hand, the occasional 14th c. form endelyng for endlong, and, on the other hand, the substitution of headlong(s), sidelong(s), flatlong(s) for the earlier headlong(s), sidelong(s), flatlong(s).

† b. Prefixed to interrogative pronoun or adv., or relative conj., forming indefinite relatives = whoever, whatever, however, etc. Also, in later use, emphasizing the correspondence of relative and antecedent, as in look as = 'just as'. Obs.

The absence of examples between the 12th and the 16th c. is remarkable: the idiom was prob. preserved in some non-literary dialect.

In later use (which is merely colloquial) the sense is commonly 'to bestir oneself briskly', 'to lose no time' (the vb. being app. taken in a sense belonging to branch III, and sharp regarded as a complementary adj.).

b. with adv. of manner († or adv. phrase): To have a certain look or appearance.

This use is often indiscriminately condemned, but is justly censurable only where look is virtually equivalent to seem, so that it requires a predicative complement and not a qualification of manner. (So, e.g. in quot. 1545.) Owing, however, to the prejudice excited by the inaccurate use, look now rarely occurs with advs. of manner other than well, ill, badly. In some early instances the apparent adv. may possibly be an adj. in ex.

Loop (lūp), sb. Forms: 5-6 loupe, 6 loppe, 3c lowpe, 7 lope, loupe, 7-loop. [Of obscure etymology.]

Prof. Skeat (Concise Etym. Dict.) suggests that the word may lie a. ON. lūp, lūp LEAF sb., comparing the Sw. lūp-knūt, Da. lūp knude, lob sb., running-knot. These compounds, however, seem to be merely modern Germanisms: the relevant sense of the verb, Sw. lūpa, Da. løbe, being app. forc'd. to early Scandinavian, and due to the influence of the corresponding G. laufen (I. G. lufen). Further, the mod. Sc. form of ON. lūp would be regularly loop, pronounced (lūp), whereas the word loop is in Sc. pronounced (lūp); the spelling loope in G. Douglas is ambiguous, but prob. represents (lūp); cf. droope = droop. The Irish and Gael. lūb, formerly suggested by Prof. Skeat, presents at least a noteworthy resemblance of sound and meaning to the Eng. word.]

Gr. Λυσιμαχίων, f. the personal name Λυσίμαχος lysimaichos, an application of the adj. Λυσιμαχος 'loosing' (i.e. ending) strife, f. λυσι-, combining stem of λυειν to loose + μαχη strife.

The form Λυσιμαχία (found only in Pliny's Latin translation) would be correct Gr. for 'the action of loosing strife'. The misinterpretation of the word is ancient; Pliny, though stating that the plant was discovered by one lysimaichos, also says that oxen that are made to eat it are rendered more willing to draw together. Ancient writers mention two kinds of lysimaquia, the purple and the yellow, the descriptions of which agree with the two plants referred to in 1 below. Modern botanists have appropriated lysimaquia as a generic name to the 'yellow loosestrife'.

Wülck.), repr. a prehistoric form **hlāfweard*, f. **hlāf* (OE. hlif) bread, LOAF + **weard* (OE. weard) keeper (see WARD sb.). In its primary sense the word (which is absent from the other Teut. langs.) denotes the head of a household in his relation to the servants and dependents who 'eat his bread' (cf. OE. hlāf-ēta, lit. 'bread-eater', a servant); but it had already acquired a wider application before the literary period of OE. The development of sense has been largely influenced by the adoption of the word as the customary rendering of L. dominus. The late ON. lǫrdar is adopted from ME.

With regard to the etymological sense, cf. mod. G. brotherr, lit. 'bread-lord', an employer of labour. In the mod. Scandinavian langs. 'meat-mother' (Sw. matmoder, Da. madmoder, Icel. matmóðir) is the designation applied by servants to their mistress.

For the phonology of the OE. word see Billing Ac. Elementarbuch §§ 367, 421, 562. In the 14th c. the word became monosyllabic through the dropping of the intervocalic v and the crasis of the vowels thus brought into contact.]

13. As a prefixed title, forming part of a person's customary appellation. Abbreviated Ld., formerly † L. (pl. Ls.), L.o.

The rules now accepted for its use are as follows. In other than strictly ceremonial use it may be substituted for 'Marquis', 'Earl', or 'Viscount' (whether denoting the rank of a peer, or applied 'by courtesy' to the eldest son of a peer of higher rank); the word of, when it occurs in the more formal designation, being dropped. Thus 'Lord Harrington', 'Lord Derby', 'Lord Manvers', 'Lord Palmerston', may be used instead of 'The Marquis of Harrington', 'The Earl of Derby', 'Earl Manvers', 'Viscount Palmerston'. A baron (whether a peer, or a peer's eldest son known by the title of his father's barony) is always called by his title of peerage (either a surname or a territorial designation) preceded by 'Lord', as 'Lord Tennyson'; if the Christian name is mentioned for distinction, it comes first, as 'Alfred, Lord Tennyson'. The territorial titles given by courtesy to judges in Scotland are treated like those of barons, as 'Lord Monboddo'. The younger sons of dukes and marquises have the courtesy title of 'Lord' followed by the Christian name and surname, as 'Lord John Russell'. These rules were, for the most part, already formulated in the 16th c., but were for a long time seldom accurately observed except by experts in heraldry.

In early use the prefixed title had most commonly the form my Lord (see 15) or the Lord. The latter survives in certain formal uses, and in the superscription of letters.

(c) In courts of law used in addressing a judge of the Supreme Court (or, formerly, a judge of any of the 'superior courts' now merged in this); in Scotland and Ireland in addressing a judge of any of the superior courts.

The Teut. word was adopted into the Rom. langs.: F. lot (whence lotir to divide, in OF. to cast lots), It. lotto game of chance, Sp., Pg. late lot, Sp. loto 'lot' put up to auction. Probably some of the uses of the Eng. word are due to the influence of F. lot. The primary meaning of the Teut. root **hlut-* is uncertain. Schrader has suggested that it may have been formed by secondary ablaut from the wk.-grade **hlut-* (repr. pre-Teut. hlut-: see HOUT) in the sb. **hluto-m*, the primary sense of which would then be the piece of wood used in casting lots. But this conjecture is very doubtful, and not free from difficulties.]

1. An object (app. usually a piece of wood) used in a widely diffused ancient method of deciding disputes, dividing plunder or property, selecting persons for an office or duty, etc., by an appeal to chance or the divine agency supposed to be concerned in the results of chance. The 'lots', each bearing the special mark of one of the competitors, were placed in a receptacle (in Homeric Greece a helmet); according to Greek procedure the vessel was shaken, the winning lot being that which fell out first; in Scandinavia (see VIGF. s.v. hlutr) the winning lot was drawn out by an uninterested party. In Eng. (exc. in rare modern instances, chiefly translations from ancient langs.) the word in this sense occurs only in the phr. to cast, draw (†also lay, put, send, throw, warp) lots (or †lot); followed by on or upon, over, between, for (the object or objects concerned); also by inf. or indirect interrog. clause.

In genuine OE. idiom the vb. governing lot was weorpan to throw (see WARP v.); cf. G. das Los werfen, L. sorles conicere, Gr. κλῆρον βάλλειν. In ME. werpen was superseded by the synonymous cast and throw. The OE. use of sendan is a Latinism, after mittere of the Vulgate. The only forms of the phrase that survive are to cast lots (arch.) and to draw lots (cf. F. tirer au sort), which is interpreted as synonymous with to draw cuts (CUT sb. 1).

On the assumption that sense 2 is the original, the word has generally been referred to Low sb.; cf. Phillips (ed. Kersey 1706), 'Luff or Lough, a Light or Flame, to Fowl with a Low-bell'. But it is difficult to see how sense 1 can be a transferred application of sense 2, while the reverse development would be quite normal.

The process of fowling with 'low-bell and hand-net' is elaborately described in Dict. Rusticum et Urbanicum (1704). The birds are to be stupefied with terror by the noise of the bell and the sudden glare from lights contained in a tin-lined box serving as a dark lantern; when they are thus rendered motionless, the net is to be thrown over them.

1864 F. OAKLEY Hist. Notes 60 The various gradations of Dissent and Low-Churchism.

Low Churchman. [Cf. High Churchman.]

A member of the Church of England holding opinions which give a low place to the authority and claims of the episcopate and priesthood, to the inherent grace of the sacraments, and to matters of ecclesiastical organization, and thus differ relatively little from the opinions held by Protestant Nonconformists.

The term, invented as an antithesis to High Churchman, was in the early part of the 18th c. used as equivalent to Latitudinarian. Afterwards it fell into disuse, but was revived in the 19th c., when the designation High Churchman had obtained a new currency as applied to those who inclined to the theology and ritual of pre-Reformation times. In this later use, Low Churchman has for the most part been viewed as equivalent to Evangelical, and has rarely been applied to members of the Broad Church School.

The spelling lewserne (quot. 1662), if not a misprint, is conclusive evidence in favour of this derivation. Etymologists have usually supposed the word to be an alteration of the OF. luserne, luserne, female lynx, a fem. of unexplained form corresponding to the masc. loup-cervier repr. L. lupus cervarius (Phny) lynx, lit. 'stag-hunting wolf' (lupus wolf, cervarius adj. f. cervus stag). But this hypothesis does not account for the form of the Eng. word, nor can it be satisfactorily referred to the OF. loup cervin (as if L. **lupus cervinus* = lupus cervarius) of which Godef. gives one example. Possibly there may have been in OF. a confusion between loup-cervier and an adopted Teut. synonym.]

2. The rebel archangel whose fall from heaven was supposed to be referred to in Isa. xiv. 12; Satan, the Devil. Now rare in serious use; current chiefly in the phrase As proud as Lucifer.

The Scripture passage (Vulg.) Quomodo cecidisti de celo, Lucifer, qui mane oriebaris? A.V. 'How art thou fallen from heaven, O lucifer, sonne of the morning?' is part of a 'parable against the king of Babylon' (Isa. xiv. 4); but the mention of a fall from heaven led Christian interpreters to suppose that 'king of Babylon' was to be interpreted spiritually, as a designation of the chief of the angels who kept not their first estate'. Hence the general patristic view that lucifer was the name of Satan before his fall. The Latin word was adopted in all the Eng. versions down to 1611; the Revised version has daystar.

[a. I.G. (Du., OFris.) luk, a shortened form of geluk (MDu. gelucke = MHG. gelücke, mod. G. glück). Parallel adoptions of the I.G. word are Icel. lúkká (14th c.), MSw. lukka, lykka (mod. Sw. lycka), Da. lykke. Probably it came into English as a gambling term; the I.G. dialects was a frequent source of such terms in 15-16 centuries.

The ultimate etymology of MHG. gelücke (—OHG. **geliucka* — OTent. type **galukjjo-n*) is obscure. So far as meaning is concerned nothing could be more plausible than Paul's view (Beitr. VII. 133 note) that the word is connected with G. gelingen (OHG. gihangan) to succeed, turn out well or ill, as G. druck pressure with dringen to press, schluck gulp with schlingen to swallow, wick wrench with wingen to wrench. But morphologically this assumption seems quite inadmissible, and most scholars deny the existence of etymological affinity in any of these instances. Formally, the word might be cognate with LOUK 1 or LUK 2, or with G. lucken to entice (OHG. luckan) and the synonymous OHG. lucken; but no probable hypothesis seems to have been formed to connect the meaning of the sb. with that of any of these *vb.*s.]

Senses 2-4 are common to various mod. langs.: F. lof, Sp. lof, Pg. lof, Du. loef (whence LG. loff, G. lof, Da. lof, Sw. lof). The manner of their development is obscure, and it is uncertain whether they originated in Fr., Eng., or (?most prob.) Du. Sense 5 is peculiar to Eng., and it is not easy to connect it with any of the other senses.

Certain other meanings which the word has had in Du. and Fr. need to be accounted for before any hypothesis as to the primitive meaning and sense-development can be regarded as satisfactory. In early mod. Du. loef, loer is explained as 'thole-pin' (scalvus, Kilian). In the 17th c. the F. lof or loo is stated to mean 'the distance from the mast to the place on the side to which the sheet is fastened when the vessel is close-hauled'. (See the quot. from Nicot in Godef., s.v.) In the existing uncertainty as to the primary meaning, the ultimate etymology remains obscure; the current view that it represents a Teut. word cogn. with ON. lofe palm, Loof sb.<sup>1</sup>, depends on the doubtful assumption that the 'lof' of sense 1 was a steering paddle.]

Lug (lvg), sb.<sup>2</sup> Chiefly Sc. and north. Also (6 Sc. louge), 6-7 lugg(e). [Of obscure etymology.

As a synonym of ear, it first appears early in the 16th c., and in colloquial Sc. use has entirely superseded the older word. Presumably this application is a transferred use of a word that existed earlier with some other meaning. It is possible that the sense 'ear-flap of a cap', which is the earliest represented in our quotes, may really be prior to the sense 'ear'; for similar transferences of words from parts of clothing to the parts of the body covered, cf. breach, crown, sole. If so, the word may perh. be of Scandinavian origin, with a general sense of 'something that can be pulled or laid hold of', specialized differently in Sw. lugg forelock, with which cf. Eng. dial. (Sheffield, North Derb.) etc. 'to pull (somebody's) lugs', meaning not as in Scotland, the ears, but the hair. (See LUG v.)

same meaning (in Anvergne, a churchwarden). See Du Cange s.v. Luminator, Luminaria.] In St. Andrews University, a student (one in each class) who was privileged to attend the professor's lectures without payment, and to receive certain dues from the other students, in return for services rendered by him.

The Librarian of the University, Mr. J. Maitland Anderson, informs us that the first student whom he has found described in the records as 'luminator' entered the University in 1697; it is, however, probable that the title goes back to medieval times. It is supposed that the 'luminator' originally provided lights and fires to the classes; but there is no contemporary evidence of this. Between 1800 and 1827 his duties seem to have been those of a clerk (cf. quot. a 1808). The office was abolished about 1830.

It is commonly stated that the University seal contains a representation of a 'luminator' holding a candle while a professor is lecturing. But whether the object is a candle or something else (a mace), and whether the figure holding it is meant for the 'luminator', seems to be quite uncertain.

Luncheon (lū-nʃən), Also 7 lunchen, lunch- ion, lunching, 7-8 luncheon, 8 lunshin. [Reluctant in some way to LUNCH sb.]

The ordinary view, that the spelling lunching represents the etymological form, appears somewhat unlikely. In our quots. the earliest form is luncheon, and this appears in our quots. earlier than lunch; and there is no evidence of a derivative verb in the 16-17th c. It is possible that luncheon might have been extended from lunch on the analogy of the relation between funch, funcheon, trunch, truncheon.

2. Originally, a slight repast taken between two of the ordinary meal-times, esp. between breakfast and mid-day dinner. The word retains this original application with those who use dinner as the name of the mid-day meal; with those who 'dine' in the evening, luncheon denotes a meal (understood to be less substantial and less ceremonious than dinner) taken usually in the early afternoon. Now somewhat formal: cf. LUNCH sb. 2.

Obviously related in some way to this Fr. word are early and dial. mod.G. lortsch, lurtch, lortz, lurz, the name of a game, also as adj. in lurz werden, a phrase in various games, expressing the failure to achieve some object aimed at; MHG. lortz, lurz (also lertz), mod. The most plausible supposition with regard to the relation between these words is that the MHG. lurz left, wrong, or its derivative lurtisch (cf. linksch from link), that adopted into Fr. as a gaming term (lourche adj.), and that lurche sb. as the name of a game was developed from the adj. Lurch (lɜːtʃ), sh. 3 [Of obscure origin.]

The word app. occurs as the second element of lee-lurch in the first quot. below, for which later nautical and other dicta. substitute lee-lurches. If lee-lurches in Falconer be not a misprint for lurches, it may represent an altered pronunciation of the older lee-latch, i.e. the word of command 'have a care of the lee-latch', i.e. 'look that the ship does not go to leeward of her course' (Milit. & Sea Dict. 1711). It seems possible that lurch originated in the compound lee-lurch, an alteration (by association with LURCH sb. 3) of lee-latch for lee-latch, which prob. contains LATCH sb. 2, LURCH sb. 2 inclination for the sense development of the etymological note on LURCH sb. 1.]

2. Of plants, esp. of grass: Succulent and luxuriant in growth.

The literary currency of this sense (which seems still to exist in s. w. dialects) is due to the recollection of the instance in Shaks. (quot. 1610). The conjecture is now discredited, but the passage as amended has had many echoes in 19th c. literature.

Lushington (lʊʃɪŋtən), slang. [Punning use of the surname Lushington, with allusion to LUSH sb. 2.]

The 'City of Lushington' was the name of a convivial society (consisting chiefly of actors) which met at the Harp Tavern, Russell Street, until about 1835. It had a 'Lord Mayor' and four 'aldermen', presiding over 'wards' called Jupiter, Poverty, Lonany, and Salute. On the admission of a new member to the 'Lord Mayor' (first years at last) harangued him on the evils of excess in drink. The 'City' claimed to have existed for 15 years; if this claim be well-founded, the existence of l. sh. will be authenticated for a date considerably earlier than that of our first quot. Our information is from 'Sir' D. Davies, the last 'Lord Mayor of Lushington'.

A. adj. Pertaining to the German reformer Martin Luther (1483-1546), his opinions and followers.

In the 16th c. the designation was used by Roman Catholic writers as coextensive with PROTESTANT; applied, e.g., to the reformed Church of England. Now chiefly applied to doctrinal views held by Luther in opposition to other reformers, e.g. his doctrine as to the nature of Christ's presence in the Eucharist (see CONSUBSTANTIATION), and as the appellation of those churches, principally in Germany and Scandinavia, which accept the Augsburg Confession as their official doctrinal symbol.

-ly, suffix 1 (Forms: 1 -lic, -lic, 2-5 -lich, 4-5 -liche, 3-5 north. -lik(e), (3 Orm. -lic, -li3, -like), 3-6 -li, 4- -ly), appended to sbs. and adjs. to form adjs., represents the OE. -lic, corresponding to OFris. OS. -lik (Du. -lijk), OIIG. -lik (MIIG. -lich, mod.G. -lich), ON. -lig-r, -leg-r (Sw., Da. -lig), Goth. -leik-s = OTeut. -liho-. The phonology of the OE. form, as also of the mod.G. and the ON. forms, is somewhat abnormal, the frequency in use of the suffix having caused loss of the original secondary stress, with consequent shortening of the vowel, and in ON. also voicing of the guttural. A further irregularity appears in the phonetic development in ME. The normal representation of OE. -lic was -lik in northern dialects and -lich in southern dialects. These forms are found as late as the 15th century; but the form -li, -ly, which (though parallel with the reduction of OE. ic to i, and of ME. everich to every) seems to be chiefly due to the influence of the Scandinavian -lig-, occurs in northern and midland dialects as early as the 13th c., and before the end of the 15th c. had become universal. In the Ormulum (c 1200) -lic (rarely -like) is used before a vowel and at the end of a line, and -li3 before a cons.; the inflected form -like (disyllabic) seems often to be used, for metrical reasons, where grammar would require the uninflected form. In the comparative and superlative (OE. -licra, -e, -licost) the ME. form had regularly -k according to phonetic law in all dialects (in the south the usual 13-14th c. form was -liker, -loker); but where the positive had the form -li new comparatives and superlatives in -lier, -liet were regularly formed from it.

The original Teut. adjs. in -liho- were compounds of the sb. *likon appearance, form, body (see LICU). Thus *mannliho- ('manly') means etymologically 'having the appearance or form of a man'; gōdliho- ('goodly') 'having a good appearance or form', or 'having the appearance or form of what is good'. The primitive force of the suffix may therefore be rendered by 'having the appearance or form indicated by the first element of the word'; but while in the historical Teut. langs. it has remained capable of expressing this meaning, it has in all of them acquired a much wider application.

When appended to sbs., the most general senses of the suffix in all Teut. langs. are 'having the qualities appropriate to', 'characteristic of', 'befitting'. In English of all periods it has been a prolific formative; the adjs. formed with it are most frequently eulogistic, as in kingly, knightly, masterly, princely, queenly, scholarly, solitary (cf. manly, womanly with manish, womanish); among the examples with dyslogistic sense are beastly, beggarly, cowardly, disastordly, rascally, ruftianly, secondly. In OE., as in other Teut. langs., the suffix had often the sense 'of or pertaining to'; but the adjs. have, so far as this meaning is concerned, been to a great extent superseded by synonyms of Latin or Romanic etymology. Thus manly formerly admitted of the senses now expressed by human and masculine; for one of the older senses of timely we must now say temporal. Another use of the suffix, common to English with other Teut. langs., is to form adjs. denoting periodic recurrence, as daily, hourly, monthly, nightly, weekly, yearly.

When -ly is appended to an adj., the resulting derivative adj. often connotes a quality related to or resembling that expressed by its primary; cf., e.g., OE. lief 'dear' with lieflic 'lovely' (or, as it might be rendered, 'such as becomes dear'). The diminutive sense found in mod.G. gelblich yellowish, süsslich sweetish, though a very easy development from the original sense of the suffix, does not seem ever to have existed in English. Even in OE. -lic had app. ceased to be used in new formations from adjs.; the new adjs. f. adj. + -ly that have arisen in ME. or in mod.E. seem to be from the advs.

-ly, suffix<sup>2</sup> (Forms: 1-2 -lice, 2-5 -liche, 4-5 -lich, 3-5 north, -like, (3 Orn. -like, -li), 3-6 -li, 4- -ly), forming adverbs, represents OE. -lice, corresponding (functionally if not morphologically) to OFris. -like, OS. -lika (M.Du. -like, Da. -lijk, MLG. -like, mod.LG. -lik), OHG. -lich (MHG. -liche, mod.G. -lich), ON. -liga, -lega (MSw. -lika, -leka, in mod.Sw. superseded by -ligt, -ligen; Da. -lig), Goth. -leikō, derived from -lika- (see -ly) with an adverb-forming suffix, (O)Teut. -li, according to some repr. the ending of the abl. fem. (pre-Teut. -ād) or neut. (pre-Teut. -ōd); according to others that of the instrumental neut. (pre-Teut. -ām).

The form-history of the suffix in Eng. is similar to that of -ly 1: in ME. the OE. -lice was normally represented by -liche (southern), -like (northern), the compar. being -liker, -liker, -loker (superl. -est).

The form -li, -ly, which was current in East Midland English in the 14th c., and became general in the 15th c., is probably due to the influence of the ON. -liga. In the strongly Scandinavianized dialect of the Ormulum (c. 1200) -lig and -like are used indifferently, according to the requirements of the metre. Where the positive ended in -li, -ly, the comparative and superlative ended in -lier, -liest. In the 15-17th c. forms like falslyer, traitorouslyer (Malory), softlier, justlier, wideliier (Long Barclay's Argenis 1625), easilier, -est (R. Baxter Saving Faith 1658) were common, but in later use the advs. in -ly are compared with more, most, the inflexional forms being only employed in poetry or for rhetorical effect.

In OTeut. an adv. with this suffix must have implied the existence of an adj. with the suffix corresponding to -ly 1. In OE., however, there are several instances (e.g. bealdlice boldly, swetlice sweetly) in which an adv. in -lice has been formed directly from a simple adj. without the intervention of an adj. in -lic. In ME. the number of these direct formations was greatly increased, and when the final -e, which was the original OE. adverb-making suffix, ceased to be pronounced, it became usual to append -ly to an adj. as the regular mode of forming an adv. of manner. It was, down to the 17th c., somewhat frequently attached, with this function, even to adjs. in -ly, as earlyly, goddily, kindlyly, livelyly, lovelyly, statellyly; but these formations are now generally avoided as awkward, while on the other hand it is felt to be ungraceful to use words like godly, goodly, lovely, mannerly, timely, as advs.; the difficulty is usually evaded by recourse to some periphrastic form of expression. In examples belonging to the 16th and 17th c. it is sometimes difficult to determine whether a writer intended the adv. goodly to mean 'in a good manner' or 'in a goodly manner', and there are other instances of similar ambiguity. In the words denoting periodical recurrence, as daily, hourly, the adj. and the adv. are now identical in form. A solitary example of an adv. f. sb. + -ly 2 with no related adj. is partly. From the early part of the 16th c. the suffix has been added to ordinal numerals to form advs. denoting serial position, as firstly, secondly, thirdly, etc. (cf. F. premierement, etc.).

When -ly is attached to a disyllabic or polysyllabic adj. in -le, the word is contracted, as in ably, doubly, singly, simply; contractions of this kind occur already in the 14th c., but examples of the uncontracted forms (e.g. doublyly), are found as late as the 17th c. Whole + -ly becomes wholly, but in all other similar instances the written e is retained before the suffix, e.g. in fastly, vilely, puerilely. Adjs. ending graphically with ll lose one l before -ly, as in fully (in southern Eng. commonly pronounced with a single l, but in Scotland often with double or long l, dully (dɒlˈli), coolly (kəˈli)). Adjs. of more than one syll. ending in y change y to i before -ly, as in merrily; in formations from monosyllabic adjs. the usage varies, e.g. dryly, drily; gayly, gaily (cf. daily, which is the only current form); shyly, shily (but always shyly); greyly, grayly has always y. Another orthographical point is the dropping of the e in the two words duly, truly. It is unusual to append -ly to an adj. in -ic; the ending of the adv. is nearly always -ically, even when the only current form of the adj. ends in -ic.

Lynch law. Orig. U. S. In early use Lynch's (Lynch's) law. The practice of inflicting summary punishment upon an offender, by a self-constituted court armed with no legal authority; it is now limited to the summary execution of one charged with some flagrant offence.

Now most commonly written lynch-law or lynch law, though the capital L is still often used.

The origin of the expression has not been determined. It is often asserted to have arisen from the proceedings of Charles Lynch, a justice of the peace in Virginia, who in 1782 was indemnified by an act of the Virginia Assembly for having illegally fined and imprisoned certain Tories in 1780. But Mr. Albert Matthews informs us that no evidence has been adduced to show that Charles Lynch was ever concerned in acts such as those which from 1817 onward were designated as 'Lynch's law'. It is possible that the perpetrators of these acts may have claimed that in the infliction of punishments not sanctioned by the laws of the country they were following the example of Lynch, which had been justified by the act of indemnity; or there may have been some other man of this name who was a ring-leader in such proceedings. Some have conjectured that the term is derived from the name of Lynche's Creek, in South Carolina, which is known to have been in 1768 a meeting-place of the 'Regulators', a band of men whose professed object was to supply the want of regular administration of criminal justice in the Carolinas, and who committed many acts of violence on those suspected of 'Toryism'.

1817 S. ROBIN. in W. Wirt Life P. Henry (1818) 372 In the year 1792, there were many suits on the south side of the James river, for inflicting Lynch's law. 1819 W. FAIRBANKS 29 Nov. in Memoir Days in Amer. (1823) 304 The people [of Princeton, Indiana]... deputed four persons to inform him, that unless he quitted the town and state immediately, he should receive Lynch's law, that is, a whipping in the woods. 1825 J. IRVING Town Prairies 41 'Lynch's law', as it is technically termed, in which the plaintiff is apt to be witness, jury, judge, and executioner. 1839 STONEHOUSE A Volume 112 The burning Reading's house was... a terrible example of what the Americans term lynch-law. 1879 FARRAR St. Paul I. 570 They seized the opportunity of executing a little Lynch law. 1888 *DAVE Amer.
